

The United States Federal Government needs to stay away from any “No Call” bans/laws that may have been, or will be, established by any State in America.

If the Attorney General for the appropriate state doesn’t do what the constituents want or need, then perhaps that elected position will be turned over to someone new when the next election takes place.

Ever since Indiana has established their “No Call” guidelines, I have been extremely happy with the results. It used to be that I would receive numerous telephone calls at the most inappropriate times. I put my name on the Indiana “No Call” list at the first opportune time, and would hate to see any Federal involvement that would take the Indiana participants back to the point where their “private time” (whatever time is deemed private by the resident within a 24 hour period) became “Open Season” for those corporations seeking to harass enough residents to somehow get a “quota” of customers.

I don’t have caller Id, nor do I wish to pay the price to have the option. If my telephone rings, I presume that the caller is someone with whom I wish to speak to. If not, I have the ability to politely hang up and cut the unwanted caller off. As much as I would hate to revert back to that option, it sounds like the FCC is proposing to put Indiana back to a point where every resident will either have to pay for Caller ID, or simply hang up on unwanted callers.

The Indiana Attorney General created the “No Call” list with the residents in mind. If these corporations wish to communicate with the people of Indiana, then let them bulk mail their requests. Indiana has an excellent “No Call” law at this time, and I think the FCC needs to avoid setting us back. If the FCC wishes to do anything at the Federal level, then create a generic law that can be overridden by the legislative representative(s) of the individual States. If the state decides to impose a harsher/stricter “No Call” law, then so be it.

If you take away the privacy that has been given to me by the Attorney General of Indiana, I will have no choice but to go back to hanging up my telephone. As much as I would hate for that to take place, I would have the option to disconnect the particular caller.

Please don’t make some Federal law that will put Indiana back a few years. Allow each state to decide for themselves what their residents want. We can vote for the person/people that we think will do the best for our state. Unless

I am missing something somewhere, I don't think I have the right to vote for anybody within the FCC.

Please leave Indiana where it currently stands. Our Attorney General has done his job.

Thanks.
